In 2004, researchers Marianne Bertrand and Sendhil Mullainathan sent fictitious resumes in response to employers' help-wanted job postings. The researchers made the resumes identical with regard to the fictitious applicants' qualifications but altered the names on the resumes to reflect male versus female names and "White-sounding" versus "African-American-sounding" names. They found that resumes with "White names" like Emily and Greg received 50 percent more callbacks for interviews than did the resumes with "Black names" like Tyrone and Lakeisha. The results of this study indicate that employment decisions of some employers might not be _____ and could indicate illegal discrimination under _____.
